invention is directed to positioning of a workpiece into a particular orientation relative to a tool or die to be used therewith, as is required during fabrication. There are many instances in the fabrication of a manufactured product where the machining of a workpiece requires some particular orientation of the workpiece relative to the tool or a die to be used therewith. Many machining operations such as welding, brazing or soldering, for example, require some particular orientation between the workpiece and a tool such as a torch or welder. Likewise, material removal may require that the workpiece be turned on its axis. The prior art provides for the use of hand tools which may be positioned manually for the purpose of adjusting the workpiece to a predetermined position of orientation, but such tools are generally limited in 1cdb36666d

. English PhoneticsÂ .Q: What's the term for the difference between an erring false accusation and an error in reasoning? I'm trying to describe the difference between an erroneous opinion and a false accusation. The problem is that I've already encountered the word 'error' in this context. It is used to describe a mistake that leads one to a wrong conclusion. I could use 'miss' but that would imply a missing piece of information. If I use 'mistake' or 'error' without a modifier, I will get a very strict meaning where the sentence still makes sense, but is it misleading in the case of false accusation, and it's potentially ambiguous as to which kind it is? A: In adversarial contexts, an error is the difference between what we think should be true and what actually is true. A false accusation is the difference between what we think is true and what actually is false. As such, false accusers are not making "errors", per se, but rather making "false accusations". There is no word that better captures the rhetorical purpose of false accusers. Q: How do I (or is it possible to) type multiple text boxes on one command? I would like to type multiple text boxes on one command, like this: & The text box below the & is a user input value and should be the first input box. The text box next to it should be the second input box. It should be possible to press return and then enter the input value again in order to get a new input value. If a text box was removed through a delete key, the input value in the next text box should be erased and then a new one can be typed in. I have already seen some questions here on this site, but all of them involve entering different input values per text box. The user input should be one value per text box. A: This would work on any text box: `InputBox["First text box", "Text in first text box", NumberInput]` & `/@ {"example1", "example2", "example3"}` A: Since you tagged this question with Mathematica 10, one better way to do this would be through the `InputField[]` This would create a new `InputField` and generate a change event whenever the value changes. The `EventHandler` could then
